

ENTRAINED AIR

We are currently using a well that creates small air bubbles in the water (entrained air). This is caused by the water entering the well above the pumping water level. This condition is known as cascading water.

Air is lighter than water and will quickly rise to the top of a glass when filled within a short period of time.

The small air bubbles do not pose any health concerns.